JAPANESE MINISTER IN SECLUSION FOR PART IN SCANDAL

Tokio, Aug. 30.—(Associated Press Correspondence.)—To divest himself of all titles and honors and to retire into seclusion probably for the rest of his life, is the punishment that has fallen on Viscount Kunetake Oura, home minister in the Okuma cabinet, whose connection with the parliamentary bribery scandal led to the resignation of the Okuma ministry. The lot of Viscount Oura is typically representative of that which befalls one of distinction in Japan whose acts have caused a national scandal.

In addition to resigning his portfolio in the cabinet and his seat in the house of peers, Viscount Oura has withdrawn from all public associations and activities including his leadership in the governmental Doshikai group and has even transferred his title to his heir. He is expected to pass the remainder of his days in obscurity. His fall is all the greater when it is borne in mind that as home minister he would have been a leading figure in the great coronation festivities in November and for his services would have been granted enviable honors subsequent to the coronation.

Viscount Oura has occupied a foremost position on the political stage of Japan for many years. His life embodies a rise from humble circumstances to great honors by capacity and energy. He began as a sergeant in the Tokio police forces when the modern police system was inaugurated in 1871. He rose rapidly until, resigning his post, he entered the army and took part in the Formosan expedition in 1874. He later was engaged in the Satsuma rebellion. After holding a succession of civil offices he became governor of various prefectures and in 1899 was appointed to the important post of superintendent-general of police. Two years later he was recognized as a ministerial member and became minister of communications in the Katsura cabinet. It was about this time that the title of Viscount was conferred upon him.

He became very active as a supporter of Prince Katsura in the formation and extension of influence of the Doshikai party, the leadership of which he shared with Baron Kato, minister for foreign affairs.

Viscount Oura is known to many people in Great Britain in consequence of his visit there in 1910 as president of the Anglo-Japanese exhibition. While in Europe he made an investigation into the reputation of Japanese merchants abroad. It is recalled that upon his return to Japan he delivered some very caustic criticism to Japanese merchants concerning their commercial morality and urged on immediate reform.

If the political crisis created by the resignation of the Okuma cabinet shows the extent of political intrigue in Japan and has shocked Japanese because of the revelation of bribery, it has at the same time been an occasion of considerable rejoicing. This is due to the fact that the independence of the Japanese judiciary has been established in a way that is the most exacting. It is pointed out that had the Okuma cabinet not been honest it might have used its influence to smother the judicial inquiry into the bribery scandal. However, despite the fact that the investigation must inevitably lead to the collapse of the ministry the inquiry under the direction of Mr. Ozaki, the minister of justice, was pushed on to the end.

BRITISH HAVE TAKEN HOOGE MINE-CRATER AFTER BLOODY FIGHT

British Headquarters in France, Aug. 31.—(Associated Press Correspondence.)—The British have retaken the mine-crater at Hooge in one of the most picturesque actions seen along the British front for a long time. Hooge is the name of what was once a village in a region as flat as a billiard table. It is in the Ypres salient, where, it is generally agreed, more blood has been spilled than over any similar length of line on the western front with the exception of Souchez, where the French made their first attack in May and June.

The blowing up of a mine under the German trench recently made Hooge about the hottest place in the Ypres salient. It was one of the largest mines the British have exploded, and it made a hole in the earth about forty feet deep and seventy feet across. The British charged and took possession of the position.

In reply to the mine, the Germans brought up their flame-ejector apparatus which they had tried on the French before but now used on the British for the first time. Around the edge of the mine-crater the Englishmen and the Germans were, at one place, only five feet apart. The crater was so big and it had so disfigured the landscape that it was difficult to "consolidate" the position, as the official bulletins say particularly when showers of bombs from either side punished any enterprise on the part of the other.

On top of a bombardment of all the neighboring part of the British line where the trenches were farther apart and of bombardment with mortars and bombs where they were close together, the Germans suddenly sprayed the British front with fire over a section where their infantry attacked. The British had to give up their crater and Hooge too and some five hundred yards of trenches. When they set out to recover the lost ground at first they found the Germans had the line bristling with machine guns, so they regained only one end of what they had lost.

The rule in the Ypres salient seems to be never to let down tamely after any set-back. Both sides fight to recover a loss no matter what the cost. Sanguinary battles are waged for few acres of ground. All one day the British kept an almost continuous roar of shells over other parts of the salient. They made the German trenches boil with dust under clouds of shrapnel smoke. The German guns replied. They threw in some more seventeen-inch shells into the ruins of Ypres and into other parts which they had not considered worthy of seventeen-inch before. The thunders of this artillery duel could be heard thirty to forty miles to the rear. It made a sound like the roll of a drum with almost no interval between the shots. Nothing heavier had been heard since Souchez.

About two the next morning guns which had been silent before came into action. They were all directed on the German trenches at Hooge, sending tons of high explosives and storms of shrapnel. Then at 4:15 by all the watches of gunners and infantry men the guns stopped. The next minute a British major at the head of a battalion leaped over the parapet. As he said, he found "nobody at home." The Germans were in their dugouts according to the custom on such occasions, taking shelter from the tornado of shell-fire which makes even a lookout hardly possible. Turning the corner of a traverse, the major fairly bumped into a German who had come out of his dug-out to see why the shelling had stopped.

"You're mine," said the major, putting his revolver muzzle to the German's breast. "He promptly agreed that he was," as the major expressed it.

The happiness of the officers and men as they told the story of that fight to the correspondent turned on gratitude to their artillery support. "It shows that artillery can do," said the Colonel, "and what the infantry can do when the guns give them that kind of aid. Their work was perfect straight on there in front of the men's noses with no shells bursting short and then they all stopped like an orchestra at the end of a piece. My only trouble with the men was to hold them back from the front line. If there is anything that puts spirit into the men it is that kind of support. We got four good machine guns and I don't know how many were destroyed. Germany is one big battery. She does it with artillery and machine guns. Gas against her guns and we shall be all right. Yes, we had a fine show."

He kept on speaking of the guns and so did the other officers and men with the depth of feeling expressive of realization that the guns meant life and death and success and failure for them. Singularly enough the British loss in taking the trench was less than in losing it. They got about a thousand yards with the first rush. Mostly they met the Germans coming from their dugouts and it was hard to hand when the Germans did not yield.

As soon as they had yielded they were started back toward the British rear, for in the maze of traverses where rifles and bombs are lying about loose prisoners may soon renew the fray. The next day a faint rumble like that of a human voice came from a pile of earth and it was found that one of the high explosives had closed the door of a dugout. The occupants were rescued alive.

When an officer and some men came to the edge of the mine-crater they found nearly a hundred Germans in the bottom of it where they had taken cover from the bombardment. The British looked down at

The Germans and the Germans looked up at the British. As one of the men said the surprise was mutual, but the Germans were a little more surprised of the two. The British had bombs in their hands. All they had to do was to stand back and toss the bombs into the crater.

Chucking bombs into a dugout when the occupants will not surrender is one of the commonest proceedings in the course of taking a trench.

"We'll give ourselves up," said a German officer starting up the wall of the crater. "You've got us."

As the Germans came up some of the British shook hands with them, and soon they were marching along a road in the midst of a German shell-fire smoking cigarettes given them by their captors. Meanwhile it was stab and thrust in other places till Briton or German was down.

Rushing up the traverses the British drove the Germans before them with bombs gaining more ground. In addition to their own bombs they used the Germans' "One German prisoner showed me how to use them," said a British bomb-thrower. "He did it instinctively when he saw I was fumbling with it. That was very helpful of him. You had to pull a string up on top before you made the throw. They seemed to be first rate bombs."

Once over the demoralization caused by the crush of the bursting shells from the British artillery concentration in their ears the Germans out of their dugouts began resisting with bombs and the British running short had to fall back traverse by traverse pursued by the Germans thus losing some of their gain before more bombs were brought up from the rear. This had to be done under gusts of shrapnel bullets for now the German guns were giving the British supports all they had to give and as fast as they could. The struggle proceeding in the midst of the scream and burst of projectiles. Twice one of the sergeants crossed the zone back to the support trenches bringing supplies of bombs before he was killed. Others were at the same work and others killed and wounded but they got enough up to hold twelve hundred yards of trench.

A Smile.

(From the Detroit Free Press.)
A symbol of a sunny soul,
Of kindly thoughts and decent deeds
Of patient striving for a goal.
Of course that the old world needs.
A proof that all is well on earth,
A token of contentment fine,
An outward show of inward worth.
Of peace with God and man a sign.
A mark that hides not greed nor hate,
Behind which lurks no selfish gulf,
Nor anger at the ways of fate,
Such is the thing we call a smile.
